Base frame is assembled and leveled at the factory for maximum strength and flatness. That guy had some issues and happy to hear his table got together and is satisfied. I install Gold Crowns as the manual states to. I cannot imagine going back to trying to install 1s and 2s without building the top upside down, with that silly old extrusion system they used on the aprons for those models. I was happy to read the 4 of 5 Gold Crown Service Manuals I found online. Gold Crown 2 is the only PDF I dont have. Trent from Toledo That guy had some issues and happy to hear his table got together and is satisfied. Trent from Toledo Obviously youll have to put it together upside down on top of the table then take it part to put it together piece by piece in proper place. Good learning experience for you and makes you use your thinking cap. Youll know your doing something when you setup a GC solo. Ever recover the rails with out removing the aprons or disassembling the rail and casting assembly Rob.MWhen you have put enough time in doing tables and learning more and more about them.you going to start doing things in different ways than the way the manual says. We dont just do things on tables cause we want to do things our way.we found better ways to make tables play better. The manufacture is in the business of selling tables.not making sure all the parts fit perfectly.<http://drjihnderma.com/pics/dagpro-manual.xml>

every table has some kind of issue with one thing or another. Its up to the mechanic to make the table go together right and play well.some care.and some just assemble the table the way they receive it and thats good for them. Glen and other top mechanics on here will tell you just how many times they had to modify new tables and old tables. People want to build the top and flip it on.whycouse its fast. Mark GregoryI reposted this out of the other persons thread to get other peoples opinions. Rob posted something other than trying to point out the obvious part about my time in this business. So to carry on and answer Robs question No I have not recovered rails in that fashion and I would appreciate it if you would describe how it is done. Thanks! Trent from ToledoI bolted rails to table then put blinds on, it kinda sucks but it is doable. The toughest thing to install for me was the plastic gully blinds, I see why there are so many GCs that do not have them. There just seems to be no easy way to get to the screws, I had to have my wife put the corner screws in cause my hands are too big to fit them in. I noticed when putting my GC together that the rails could be moved around on the table with the bolts started but not tight. I assumed that meant it would be a good idea to get the rails straight and square before tightening them down. Can you still do this if you assemble the rails upside down and still have all the holes line upNow having said that I have no problems getting the holes to line up. I think it is because if you have the castings in the proper place, everything just lines up. Never have had an issue lining up. Not saying it does not happen to tables that are flawed or in terrible condition, but, I am saying it does not happen to me as I try very hard to only buy quality tables to customize. I have installed 15 Gold Crowns in the last 13 monthsstarted my business May of 2012 to be very exact.

If you rush on this part on any GC models I have noticed that that the rails and castings will not be correct and you have to start over. So I have found in my short experience that if you rush you are just wasting your time. If really depends on how much my clients like to talk!!! That can take up to an extra 2 hours!!! lol Trent from ToledoI bolted rails to table then put blinds on, it kinda sucks but it is doable. Can you still do this if you assemble the rails upside down and still have all the holes line up The size of the rail bolt holes in the slates allows for considerable adjustment when positioning the rail system. Remember to go down the line tightening each bolt a bit at a time much like one would torque wheel bolts on a car. Separately, I have never seen a GCII installation manual either. Perhaps Brunswick never printed one and instead continued to use the GCI edition. When I purchased used my old GCI, I wrote to Brunswick and they actually sent me a brand new installation manual free of charge. I let it go when I sold the table, something I have regretted to this day. So long as the rails and castings line up I say what ever works for you with success is the route to go. I reposted this out of the other persons thread to get other peoples opinions. Thanks! Trent from Toledo On the GC4 as you pictured the side pocket castings are notorious for bending the bolt hole tabs when tightened or mishandled, in turn puts stress and could even cause the wood on the end of the rails to rip out. there is only one bolt holding the GC4 side pocket casting to rail Your relying on the aprons to hold it all together. Dont count on it; that hardware will fail you. Once those tabs of the GC4 castings make there mark on the ends of the rails its kinda like dye and the cast.

If any of the hardware has fallen out or come loose and you show up to recover the table and take the rail bolts out and the ball box off and go to flip the box without checking to make sure all the hardware is in place and tightened you could do some serious damage if that assembly comes apart as your flipping the top assembly as one. I dont know if youve ever thought about tightening and making sure everything is in place before attempting flipping or removing anything. There is a lot of things that can be done or not done to prevent damaged equipment and head ache. If a rail apron assembly is flipped in place on the table ready for bolts and has the side pockets are pitching in at the side pocket castings of both side, the quick and easy fix is to tighten the end rails then tug on the casting to get it straight then quickly tighten the rail bolt to keep it in place but with out loosing the casting bolt youve bent the attachment tab even more. So now you have got a bent tab, thats fine it was already bent a little from who ever the last guys that over tightened it. All good till thats happened a few times and its cracked or broken off. So loosening all the side castings and apron bolts to align would of been the best way but a real pain turning the bolt unless you have ratchet wrenches or completely remove that apron. Which in turn if you would of just took your time and built it piece by piece youd be a lot happier and less possibility of head aches and or damage to the equipment. Dont get me wrong the top can be done that way you do but know what your up against, you one day you will find a table that you are be dam happy that you checked the hardware on before removing the top assembly as one, so I just saved your ass. Ship the fiddy! And for how to recover the rails with out taking the assembly apart that will be another fiddy Your getting off cheap. Rob.MI see your points and appreciate your attention to detail.

<http://www.acbc.wa.edu.au/images/4-channel-dmx-dimmer-pack-manual.pdf>

I have noticed some bent GC4 Castings and understand what you are talking about!! The rails are not to be picked up when attached by the side pocket casting!!!! I make sure to tighten all hardware properly before we move the top of the table and if you do not it is more than obvious because the castings dont line up correctly and must start over. So now will also make sure to check all hardware before I remove any tops of tables. Thanks Trent from Toledo I am gonna get that recovering rails thing out of ya at some point!! I see your points and appreciate your attention to detail. Thanks Trent from Toledo I am gonna get that recovering rails thing out of ya at some point!! They have a fiberglass skirt that prevents them from being put over the slate. Trent from Toledo p.s. you put those on last. I dont find a lot of tables with those!!! Trent from Toledo p.s. you put those on last. I dont find a lot of tables with those!!! Installing after the aprons are in place would be very difficult. The way the skirts wrap inward the bottom edges are almost parallel to the floor when installed leaves but a couple of inches lest interference from the frame rails. The head rail skirt would be particularly frustrating because the base frame pedestal imposes additional access limitation. If one has the plastic skirting, hanging the rails and aprons with skirting attached seems the best approach. IOW, the aprons with skirts are best installed as per the GCI manual. Installing after the aprons are in place would be very difficult. IOW, the aprons with skirts are best installed as per the GCI manual. Which is why I said the rails and pocket castings mount and are lined up first. I like the look of the old ones with the skirts in all original condition, but, for custom tables I like them without. It was in such good condition when I bought it, all I really did was give the thing a bath from all the cigarette smoke, new rubber and cloth and it came out beautiful.

<http://17eldonsquare.com/images/4-channel-amp-manual.pdf>

We had to put the aprons on the GC 1 Service Manual method due to the skirting. I am going to try the rails on first method for 3s, 4s because the apron system is super easy in comparison to the latter. I appreciate everyone's input. Trent from Toledo. A little history of Pat McKernan The Seattletimes writes and I quote. The Table was designed with Figured Style Rayings Board that allows for fine tuning the table to real square shape and any other shape to the likeness. The Gold Plating and all metal works was done by a company in Seattle called Allied Plating and Metal works. This Gold Crown I is made of a real 1960s solid mahogany instead of the cheap

Chinese wood that Brunswick is using for the Gold Crown V and beyond. The wood is painted in black glossy finish with gold trim li Official tournament size 9 feet and black onyx color scheme. The table also has a ball return. The table is in great condition, with superficial marks that would be expected from years of use. The only major defect is a single, small chip in the black finish, as shown above in the picture section. The bumpers of the table are in good condition and do not need to be replaced; however, the tables felt should be replaced. Please check out pics and call with any questions before bidding3044165643.I purchased the table approximately 5 years ago and drove 150 miles to pick it up. I was told this table was originally purchased by the University of Wisconsin as a Gold Crown 3. The university later upgraded the table to a Gold Crown 4 by purchasing the new Gold Crown 4 upgrade kit and installing the new top onto the Gold Crown 3 base. I researched this and discovered that the only difference in this table and a pure Gold Crown 4 is that the slate base is not selfleveling. Otherwise. This is a Gold Crown 4 table.
